

Resume Project

Total Points: 250

Purpose

For this project, you will develop a resume targeted to a specific job or internship in your eventual major. Resumes not only list your skills and qualifications for a particular position but do most of the arguing when it comes to getting you an interview. In other words, resumes are highly-charged, formulaic arguments. How much attention you pay to your resume often reveals how serious you are to potential employers. A resume and a cover letter represent your first opportunity to show a manager, vice president or team leader how effectively you communicate.

Project Sequence

You'll get the most out of this project if you develop a new resume. Specifically, you should target your resume to a particular position, which means that you should begin searching through job and internship postings now. You probably have not completed many courses in your academic major, so consider choosing an internship. We'll discuss how to read a job or internship posting in class.

After you scour ads or professional listings within your field of interest, complete these tasks:

1. Refer to the samples on Canvas and choose the kind of resume you need—traditional or skills—based on our discussions, your background, work history, desired position, etc.;
2. Pay particular attention to the Rentz chapter on career development;
3. Find a job or internship posting that you could legitimately apply to by Summer 2027;
4. Conduct research on the company or organization you have chosen to target;
5. Build the resume using the content development strategies and design principles we discuss in class;
6. Upload the final version of your resume to Canvas

The Posting

You will turn in a digital copy of your job/internship posting with your resume. If you find a posting online, make sure you print a copy to PDF immediately, since employment postings often disappear. You won't be able to email it to me; it must be in plain text to the Google Doc you submit.

Development and Design

Pay particular attention to your resume's development and design. Resume readers certainly do, as you will soon discover. Your resume must conform to the established design principles we review extensively in our meetings. It must also be as complete as possible, and we will also discuss how to fill out your resume, i.e., how to develop it using the unique skills and experiences that set you apart from other candidates.

Supporting Handouts

These handouts will support you as you complete the Resume Project. You'll find them in the Resume Project folder on Canvas. I may be adding more handouts depending on class need.

- Developing a Skills Section
- Demonstrating Experience (I and II)
- Resume Power Verb

Evaluation

I use a rubric when I evaluate your resume. You'll find a copy of that in our Resume Project folder on Canvas.

As always, please see me with questions as we move forward with this project.
